“101 Dalmatians” and Breed Popularity in the U.S.

By Cheryl Steinmetz

In 1960 AKC registered 1,785 Dalmatians. That placed them 30th in breed popularity. Ten years earlier, in 1950, 2,132 Dalmatians had been registered, placing them 21st in breed popularity.

In 1956 a story called “The Great Dog Robbery” was published in serial form from June through September in Women’s Day magazine. The story was by English author Dodie Smith. Viking Press published the children’s book in 1957 as The Hundred and One Dalmatians. Shortly thereafter the story was purchased by Disney.

Author Dorothy Gladys Smith was born in Lancashire, England on May 3, 1896. She attended the Royal Academy of Dramatic Art in London and when Dodie’s acting career proved unsuccessful she began writing plays and movie scripts. Her first successful play, Autumn Crocus (1931) began a string of five successful plays in seven years performed on the London stage.

Smith moved to the U.S. in 1938 with her companion Alec Beasley and their Dalmatians. They were married in 1939. According to the Dodie Smith website, “Sadly, in 1940, the Beesleys’ beloved Dalmatian Pongo died. Knowing that only another dog could help them get over the loss, they acquired two more Dalmatians, Folly and Buzz. In 1943, Folly and Buzz became the proud parents of 15 pups, one of which appeared to be stillborn but was revived by Alec...a scene that would feature in The Hundred and One Dalmatians.” Dodie returned to England alone in 1951 to oversee a production of one of her plays. Alec remained in the U.S. with the dogs because English law required a six-months’ quarantine for the dogs, and it wasn’t until 1953 that Dodie, Alec and the dogs returned to England for good. Again, according to the website, “She was asked many times why she had stayed away from England for so long, and found that people did not seem to believe the reason was her reluctance to quarantine the dogs!”

Walt Disney Company released their animated full length feature film based on the story in 1961.
occasionally re-released the cartoon feature to movie theaters.

Between 1960 and 1970 Dalmatian AKC ranking changed little. In 1960 Dals were 30th in popularity and in 1970 they were 29th; although individual registrations increased to 6,961. By 1980 Dals dropped down to 41st with 5,585 individuals registered.

The movie was released to theaters in December of 1986 and again in July 1991. As is shown in the material in the DCA archives, it was during these years that extensive advertising and promotion accompanied the releases. Many cartoon-character children's coloring books, sticker books and story books were printed in 1986 or 1991. Most of the Disney-licensed blankets, children's clothing and stuffed animals are also from this time period.

In April 1992 Blockbuster's News & Preview announced the upcoming home-edition video release. “Walt Disney's classic 101 Dalmatians is finally out of the vaults and into video...” says the story, “Now celebrating its 30th anniversary, this beloved tale of a dramatic diabolical dognapping, and the ensuing chase across the winter English countryside, is considered one of Disney’s greatest works.”

After being in 41st place by AKC registrations in 1980, our rise in popularity began in 1986. We were back up to 30th in 1986, then 29th in 1987, 24th in 1989, 19th in 1990, and 15th in both 1991 and 1992. In 1992, 38,927 individual Dalmatians were registered by AKC.

In 1993 Dalmatian registrations took another leap to 9th place and we broke into AKC's Top Ten and remained in the same position for 1994. John Mandeville wrote about fad breeds in a Registration Statistics article in the April 1994 AKC Gazette. He discussed the fate of Chows as they dropped lower and lower just as the Irish Setter and St. Bernard had in earlier years...and he accurately foresaw the future of Dalmatians. “The American public,” he wrote “almost always has a fad breed. Invariably, such breeds have unique and appealing qualities. They also have attributes that do not really make them candidates for mass popularity. The result is a sharp increase in popularity and an equally sharp decline.”

In the Summer 1995 Spotter, in her "Spotlighting" column, Joanne Nash wrote about statistics, popularity and Mandeville's comments. Joanne wrote, “Dalmatians have been the fad breed of this decade, and while we had hoped the breed would never reach the Top Ten it appears possible that 9th may be the highest ranking we'll achieve.” Joanne was right.

In 1995 registrations dropped and our ranking settled on 11th place. And it was in the Spring of 1995 that a Disney representative wrote to DCA asking for assistance in recruiting Dalmatian puppies for a new live 101 Dalmatians movie.

Registrations in 1996 dropped again and our position stopped on 15th. Ultimately the live-action remake was filmed in England, but 1996 was a very busy year for DCA, regional clubs and everyone involved in Public Relations. The new movie hit the theaters Thanksgiving 1996, and every newspaper and TV show had a story about Dalmatians. Every club did parades, interviews and photo shoots, and we presented the general message: “Don’t buy on impulse, find out about Dalmatians before you buy and go to a reputable, experienced breeder.”

In 1997 the registration drop continued and we were 17th. The 1998 numbers were less than half of the year before and our ranking fell to 30th. The home video release of the live action 101 and the live action sequel, 102 Dalmatians did not slow our decline. In 1999 we ended at 40th position and in 2000 we were down to our lowest position in over 50 years; we were 49th in breed popularity.

Since 2000 our fall has not ceased. In 2004 only 1,012 individual Dalmatians were registered with the AKC, placing us in 80th place. Watching the monthly numbers in 2005, we may not yet have hit bottom.

Ten years ago, in her Summer 1995

Spotter column, Joanne Nash wrote, “If Dals follow the traditional fad breed pattern the slight decline in numbers for 1994 is a harbinger of further declines. We can hope before too many more years that the breed will be back at an appropriate level of popularity, with sufficient dogs to maintain a broad enough gene pool but not exceeding the number of dogs for which good homes are available.”

How many dogs with different pedigrees constitute a broad enough gene pool? That question, along with what is an appropriate level of popularity, will be answered in our next 100 years.
